

OMA completes first phase of 'park grove' development in miami

OMA has finalized the first phase of 'park grove', a luxury residential scheme in miami overlooking biscayne bay. the first of the development's distinct towers is now complete, with work on the final tower set to wrap up in 2019. new photographs detail the scale of the project, which seeks to blend the site's architecture with art pieces by jaume plensa and michele oka doner, among others. the complex boasts a host of amenities, including a rooftop pool deck, an outdoor amphitheater, and a 28-seat private screening room.

all images © robin hill park grove, which is being developed by terra and the related group, comprises three structures: 'one park grove', 'two park grove', and the 'club residences tower'. the project's architectural design has been led by rem koolhaas and shohei shigematsu of OMA, with meyer davis responsible for the project's interiors — which feature kitchens and baths by william sofield. meanwhile, landscape architecture firm enea has designed two-acres of private gardens that contain a host of on-site amenities in addition to the artworks.

the first of the development's distinct towers is now complete

'sculptural perimeter columns bound each tower, directing views toward the bay and providing column-free living,' explains OMA. 'the spacing of these columns addresses privacy requirements between towers, while the orientation of columns mitigates solar exposure. the tapering column profile creates a destabilizing, mirage-like effect from afar, while maximizing their connection to the faceted glass façade on a construction detail level.' see designboom's previous coverage of the project under construction here.

the complex boasts a host of amenities, including an outdoor amphitheater apartments offer sweeping views across biscayne bay the tower's reception and lobby floor-to-ceiling windows maximize natural light generously proportioned terraces encourage outdoor living dark wood tones have been used in the spa the kids room references the scheme's bucolic setting landscape architecture firm enea has designed two-acres of private gardens works by artists such as jaume plensa are also included